I have a database containing thousands of records. I am querying the database with angular and node.js with express. When you click a button or link, it starts a count. Doing it this way, I always have the database to query, but the application will wait until the count is done and refresh the page. If I do it like this, it works, but this limits me: `setInterval(function() { Query(.....); }, 5000);` If I do it like this, it has horrible performance. `setInterval(function() { var start=0; Query(.....); while(start < count){ } start++; setInterval(function(){ Query(.....); }, 5000); }, 5000);` Also I am receiving errors in the web and console. When I try to delete a record in the database with Queries, it is being converted to an uncaught type error and says the local variable 'count' is not defined. If I delete the while code, it says the local variable 'start' is not defined. I can't understand why this has such a big impact in performance. The db call is a single resource that should be loaded first, the while and setInterval should not impact performance and in fact, they actually perform it. I really need to use setInterval in my case, there is a reason for doing so. Can someone help me, how to make it so it works with the performance and the user experience. Thanks for any help. A: setInterval will always delay the execution of your function by 5 seconds. You should do not use an interval there. Instead use a setTimeout. setTimeout(function() { Query(.....); }, 5000); setTimeout is easier to handle and is executed after the page has loaded. Therefore you don't need to use a while loop. And for your other error, you
